Instructor

GREG HESSEL - Greg has worked as a trainer and consultant for over 20 years. He is a professional consultant who helps organizations grow, change, and manage conflict. Over the last 8 years, he has provided training to the Vermont Agency of Transportation, Vermont Office of Child Support and many other organizations.

About

Currently, our workforce is experiencing four generations working together. Each brings unique values, styles and characteristics to the job. At its best, this generational diversity can be a strategic advantage. However, there is also the potential for generations to misunderstand and stereotype each other in ways that create conflict and misunderstanding.

This course is designed to help teams better manage generational differences more effectively.

It includes presentations and activities helping participants understand the traits typical of Traditionalists, Baby Boomers, Generation X, and Millennials; differences between generations; how differences can enhance an organization through understanding differing perspectives; the dangers of stereotyping; recognizing problems associated with generational differences; and how to bridge generational differences.

Additionally, this course includes an overview of fundamental leadership and supervisory skills needed for any leader to be successful.

Audience

This workshop is appropriate for anyone looking to improve their skills at working with other generations. Special attention will be given to those supervising, but supervisors are strongly encouraged to bring members of their teams who are of different generations.

Maximum class size 20.
